

Big Tech and Media Manslaughter

(Copyright ©OneTruthOneLaw.com 2021)

When Big Tech and Media companies interfere with public discourse using various methods, including misinformation, and banning content, they are acting like political operatives and therefore share responsibility for the consequences of their deceptive actions. For instance, when Big Tech and the Media remove content or manipulate facts prior to a national election, that would damage the chances of their chosen candidate to win, then any “fatal” decisions their candidate makes when he/she is in office are shared by these same companies. Therefore, even though they did not have their “finger on the trigger” when thirteen servicemen and women were killed recently in Kabul, this does not mean these companies are innocent. In reality, they are guilty of manslaughter because the candidate they helped gain power made decisions that led to the death of these same personnel.

So “yes” elections have consequences, and those who interfere with elections like Big Tech and Media companies, are responsible in the same way as someone who “accidentally” kills a person with their car or truck.

If Americans don’t wake up and take action to minimize the power and interference of Big Tech and the Media, then serious consequences will continue, including fatal decisions by their “anointed representatives” who hold political office. These manipulative and deceptive political operatives need to back off and allow citizens freedom of information and speech without any interference; otherwise there will be more “blood on their hands”. They certainly are not qualified to rule a country, nor are duly elected to do so.
